Topic:

The degree will disappear, your skill will pay you only in the new global economy. How will you comment on this assumption?

Solution:

Degree and skill are two sides of the same coin. To succeed in the race of life, a person needs to have a degree along with the skill. A degree without skill would be as empty as a skill without a degree.

Similarly, every degree holder is not necessarily skilled. The degree is an authentic certificate that the person applying for the post is having the knowledge of the work requirement and has the ability to manage the functioning and justify the post.

The degree makes a person more confident in his approach and outlook. These things are an essential part of personality development. Every degree holder is not necessarily skilled. It is the skill that helps to achieve the target not the degree.

Skill is an abstract term that cannot be evaluated on the bit of paper. It is a broad spectrum that is groomed within the individual and matured through the repeated practical implication in life. It is not the degree that the skill has a need for success. A degree can just earn the job, but it cannot help to grow further without skill.

So, we can say that yes Degrees will disappear, your skill will pay you only in the new global economy.
